FRANCIS HENRY LINCOLN, Class Secretary.
ARTHUR BROOKS.
GEORGE COMBE MANN.

"But, if the half that cynics say be true,
When the wide world is opened to our view,
We shall not find it, like the small world here,
Free, open-hearted, trusting, and sincere.
'T will be at best a busy market-place,
Where men but nod to each familiar face;
Where the great crowd are strangers, and the rest
Partners in trade, acquaintances at best.
But we a fortune happier far shall know,
When forth into the field of toil we go:
Bound fast together by the search for truth,
Our souls have welded in the heat of youth;
And, if the world be cold, its very chill
Will make the union only stronger still."

Class Poem.

CLASSMATES:

We have reached another mile-stone in our life's journey, and it is my pleasant duty to present to you this report. In looking over these pages, I hope there will be brought to your minds pleasant recollections of the four years we spent together, as they have come to me in receiving your letters. I thank you all for your generous assistance in responding so promptly.

We have lost five of our number by death since the last report, viz.: Barton, Fox, R. King, Leonard, Longworth, of whom fitting words of eulogy will be found in the report.

Proud of our record in the past, I wish for you all good health and increasing prosperity in the future.

FRANCIS HENRY LINCOLN,
Class Secretary.

GEORGE LEONARD BARTON.

Born in Gill, Mass., November 6, 1845.

Died in Turner's Falls, Mass., February 19, 1879.

July 22, 1877, his third son, George Leonard, was born.

The following sketch of his life and character has been prepared for this report by Hoague, at the request of the Secretary : —

Our classmate, GEORGE LEONARD BARTON, died on the 19th of February, 1879, at his home in Turner's Falls, Mass., after a brief illness, of pneumonia. He was born in Gill, Mass., November 6, 1845, and entered the class from Exeter Academy as a Sophomore, without a condition.

Upon leaving college he travelled in the West; and in November, 1867, he began studying law in the office of J. H. Carpenter, in Madison, Wis. In the summer of 1868 he returned to the East, and became the principal of the High School in Greenfield, Mass. He held this position for two years at the same time pursuing his law studies in connection with the office of W. S. B. Hopkins. Subsequently he held the position of private tutor in a family in Framingham, Mass., for a year, still pursuing his law studies. In December, 1871, he was admitted to the bar of Franklin County, and in the beginning of 1872 he opened offices both in Greenfield and in Turner's Falls, where he lived. Soon afterwards he received a commission as Trial Justice for Franklin County, and in that capacity was called upon to hear and decide many local causes.

From his admission to the bar to the time of his last sickness he continued steadily in the regular and faithful practice of his profession. With his superior abilities and acquirements, his readiness and skill in writing and speaking, combined with a conspicuously upright and honorable character, his ultimate success, in the best sense of the word, was assured. It is plain, from the encomiums passed upon him by those who knew him best at the time of his death, that in the community where he lived he had already secured recognition, not only in his character as a lawyer, but also by virtue of those substantial traits essential to the useful and worthy citizen. In the mentions of his death in the public prints, it was said that by that event "the Franklin County bar loses one of its most promising" members, — "one who was destined to lead in his profession in the county." He was spoken of as "one of our best citizens," as a "good and noble man," in whose death the community where he lived had suffered an irreparable loss. His classmates will recognize these tributes to his character as peculiarly appropriate. Apart from his superior talents, he secured by sheer force of character the respect of his associates to a remarkable degree. He could always be relied upon. This was peculiarly true of him while still a schoolboy at Exeter; it was true of him in college and throughout life. Though open and frank in his bearing, he was excessively modest and retiring in his disposition. He was warm-hearted and devoted to his friends; and although he seldom saw any of his classmates, yet his letters to the Class Secretary show that he preserved the liveliest interest in their welfare. He maintained a singular openness of mind and independence of thought, was liberal in his opinions, and inclined to be speculative. He was, accordingly, a most agreeable companion, never shocked or silenced by the advance of opinions of which he did not approve. His language was always as pure as his conduct was blameless. He had preserved, in a remarkable degree, from his boyhood, the large and heroic outlines of his character, which served to raise the man above his work, even in the noble profession which he had chosen. In 1872, Barton married Miss Emma Vail Sanford, of Greenfield. They have had three children. Upon his second son, Barton bestowed the name of Joseph Leavitt Sanborn, in token of his affection for Sanborn, upon whose death he wrote: "He was the best friend I had in the world."

It is our mournful privilege to tender to his bereaved wife our warmest sympathies in her great grief, while attempting to record our appreciation of the noble and manly character of our classmate, and our sorrow at his untimely death.

* EDWARD WINSLOW FOX.

Born in Portland, Me., December 26, 1845. Died in Charleston, S. C., February 21, 1877.

At the meeting of the Class on Commencement Day, 1877, the following sketch of his life and character was read by Miller: —

Classmates:

Our annual meeting, to-day, is saddened by the absence of one whose hand we warmly clasped one year ago. Our classmate, Edward Winslow Fox, died at Charleston, S. C., Feb. 21, 1877. He was born Dec. 26, 1845. The first seven years of his life were passed in Portland, Me.; the next three in travelling with his father and mother for the health of the latter. She died in 1856, and from that time till he entered college he was in Portland again. Toward the close of the Freshman year he enlisted for three months, and became, as he himself says, "one of that glorious Provincetown band on whom the fitting eulogium has been pronounced, that 'of the half-dozen who went forth, but six returned.'" Of his service at Provincetown, he says, "I passed three careless months of bathing, reading, and foraging, with zest-giving alternatives of drill and guard." In his Junior year he became one of the editors of the first number of the Harvard Advocate. During the remainder of his college course he was an editor of that sprightly paper, and wrote many of the best articles that appeared in it. The first year after graduation he spent in Europe. On his return he began the study of law, and in 1870 took the degree of LL. B. at the Harvard Law School, and in October of the same year he was admitted to the bar in Portland. He immediately began the practice of his profession, which he continued assiduously almost to the day of his death.

In January of this year he began to have pain in the region of the liver, and to show signs of overwork, and after a little time he was advised to go South for a few weeks. Accordingly he set out, accompanied by his wife and father. On the way he suffered severely from chills and fever. At Charleston, "this trouble was removed, but he continued to grow weaker, and without much suffering wasted away." The cause of his death is unknown. His physicians do not agree in regard to it and as no post mortem was had, the uncertainty will never be removed.

Though his life was so short, it was eminently successful. He had already acquired an amount of business and a degree of consideration from the bench, the bar, and the community, which are rarely attained before middle life. The tribute of respect paid to his memory by the Cumberland bar, of which he was a member, and by the highest Court of his State, was such as is reserved for those who hold a first place in ability and character. There is no position, honor, or reward belonging to his profession which he might not reasonably have hoped to obtain. His unremitting industry, his acumen, his learning in the law, his keen insight into human nature, and his steadfast integrity, had already given him a high rank as a lawyer, and if his life had been spared, would have given him the very highest. Combined with these, his clear judgment, unerring reason, love of justice and truth, quiet dignity of bearing, disinterestedness, and impartiality peculiarly fitted him for a position on the bench. He had a childlike simplicity of character, and a maidenlike purity in thought, word, and deed. For fourteen years we knew him, and I believe not one of us ever knew him to utter an untruth, or to speak a word his mother would have blushed to hear. He was shy and reserved with strangers, but frank and open-hearted with his friends. He gave his confidence and affections slowly, but without reserve. His imagination, his humor, his perception of the delicate shades of character, and his command of a clear, manly, and vigorous style of expression, would have given him a successful career in literature. Indeed, he would have been a leader in any profession or in any class of men.

Though death has removed him from among us, it cannot take away our love for him, or make dim our recollection of what he was. It may be some slight consolation to the loving wife and noble father he left behind, and to his two infant children, when they come to feel the loss they cannot now appreciate, to know that he had here fourscore of warm friends who are proud of his ability and success, who admire his amiable character and high qualities, and who consider it not the least of the advantages of the four years they spent in college that they were permitted to know and to associate with him.

Voted, That, as a tribute of respect to our deceased classmate, this memorial be entered on the Class Records, and a copy be sent to his widow and father.

* RUFUS KING.

Born in Cincinnati, O., February 19, 1846. Died in Cincinnati, May 3, 1878.

At the meeting of the Class on Commencement Day, 1878, the following sketch of his life, prepared by Worthington, was read: —

Rufus King Jr. has left us, another victim to that scourge that has carried off so large a percentage of those who have dropped from our class ranks, — consumption. His last illness may be said to go back to a cough, caught in April, 1877, and which never left him. Last November this cough suddenly resulted in a severe attack of pleuropneumonia. For a time he hung between life and death but early in December began slowly to mend, and gradually to give hopes of a full recovery. He left his bed about New Year's, and from that time looked anxiously forward to a proposed visit to the South, through which he hoped to escape our fickle and severe spring, and by breathing the balmy air of Louisiana to gain renewed health and vigor. His strength returned very slowly, and day after day, week after week, his departure was postponed, and it was not until very late in February that he was able to leave. By this time the season had advanced so far, in New Orleans, which was his goal, that he lost much of the benefit that he expected to derive from his journey, and he suffered from exhaustion caused by the heat. He returned to Cincinnati early in April with the right lung gone and the left affected. For a time, after his return, he seemed to grow better, but this was quickly followed by a relapse, and on Easter, April 21, after having been unusually well during the day, he took his bed in the evening, never again to leave it. For the next ten days his sufferings were excruciating, till at last stupor came to his relief, followed in a few days by death. He died a little past four in the morning of May 3, and his mortal part was recommitted to the earth on May 6.

He had been married on February 9, 1871, to Louise Este Miller, of this city, and left surviving him his widow, and an only child, a boy six years old, bearing his own name.

To you who knew him so well, it seems hardly necessary to speak of his life while in college. Entering with better preparation than most of us, and of good natural ability, he was easily able to keep up with the current work of the class, make a respectable showing on the rank list, and yet have ample time for that out of class-room college life, which is one of the greatest benefits, as well as one of our pleasantest remembrances of Cambridge.

In the sports of the River and the Delta he was equally at home, and to each equally devoted. In the adventures and innocent mischief of our Freshman year he took a prominent part; and the same spirit, indulged in his Sophomore year, led to his suspension and being dropped into the class below. During his absence from college of a year and a half his strong class feeling, and pride in '67, made him keep up with our work, in the hope that he might eventually be allowed to rejoin us, though it was not till the last of the eighteen months was over that the faculty removed the "dropping," which he had regarded as by far the weightiest part of the penalty placed upon him. After his return, in the middle of our Junior year, his chief ambition in his out-door work was to become one of the Harvard Nine; and I well recollect the joy he showed when, shortly after our Class Day, he was regularly installed as one of the defenders of the college's reputation, although he never, I believe, had an opportunity after that time of playing with the club in a match.

Of him, as a man of business, his own letters to our Secretary speak, and I will do no more than take up the thread where he left off. From the fall of 1875 to midsummer of 1877, he was without occupation, ready to put his hand to anything that might promise well, but finding nothing of much promise. In that year the opportunity for which he had long waited came, and he grasped it eagerly. In his autobiography in the Class Book, he says: "Although I shall study the law as a profession, I intend to engage in railroading as far as I am able." Last summer there was organized in this city the Cincinnati Southern Railroad Company, to operate a railroad built by the city, and extending thence southwardly something over one hundred miles into Kentucky. Of this road he was appointed Paymaster, and he entered upon his duties with all the energy and vigor of one who had at last found his life's work.

Earnest, zealous, and diligent, he won golden opinions from those associated with him in the office, both superiors and inferiors. It was his desire to identify himself with the road, and when he continued so sick, last winter, his mind was constantly preyed upon by the fear that his place might not be held for him. There was nothing that so buoyed up and kept him to the battle of life as the repeated assurances of the officers of the railroad that his place would always be ready for him when he was ready for it. Even after his return from the South, when to all others it seemed too plain he would never be fit for work again, he was constantly looking forward to the time when he would again be "going over the road."

His character was one easy to decipher. There was nothing hidden or secret about him. Open-hearted, impulsive, ready for any enterprise of fun, frolic, or daring; easily excited, and quickly kindled to hot words, but still more quickly calming down, and resentment extinguished so utterly one would think it never could have been; exceedingly warm in his attachments; not hesitating to let his dislikes be known; social with all others; at times morose, and then those friends who knew him best would leave him to himself, feeling assured that thus the spell would pass from him the quicker, but almost always the merry, jovial, hearty companion, ready with a song in a crowd, with converse among the few; the embodied life and energy of the party, when engaged in any expeditions with those he liked; zealous in everything he undertook, working with all his might, as a man works whose heart is in his enterprise; he was a man easy to learn to know, and when known easy for most men to like.

The strength of his class feeling, his attachment to the class, his love for the college, have been already alluded to. This devotion continued with singular intensity until his dying day. It would meet its fit reward if the picture and memory of him, who had you always in his thoughts, were brought afresh to your minds and there imprinted so as never to fade away.

Voted, That as a tribute of respect to our deceased classmate, this memorial be entered on the Class Records, and a copy be sent to his family.

*JOHN EDWARDS LEONARD.

Born in Fairville, Chester County, Pa., September 22, 1845. Died in Havana, Cuba, March 15, 1878.

At the meeting of the Class on Commencement Day, 1878, the following sketch of his life and character was read by Lowell: —

On the 15th of March, 1878, our classmate, JOHN EDWARDS LEONARD, died at Havana. During the ten years that had elapsed since he delivered our oration he had risen to a high position in public life. His career has been of the most interesting nature. Unfortunately our means of ascertaining the particulars of that career are very meagre. He wrote two short notes to the Class Secretary. These must be supplemented from the memories of those of us who have seen him since we graduated, and from other sources. His life, meanwhile, was full of busy schemes and active work. We liked to watch his successes. His death was to us at once the loss of a friend and the loss of an excitement.

After leaving college Leonard went to Europe. I do not think that many of our classmates met him there, though I remember that some one or two of them did see him in Rome, where he was lodging with an ecclesiastic of such rank as to be called Monsignore, with whom, it is said, he was studying the Canon Law. He was also for a time in Paris, and it is on record that he came back to this country with a degree of Juris Utriusque Doctor, obtained at Heidelberg. He then studied during one term (1869–70) at the Harvard Law School, and soon afterwards moved to Louisiana.

How amusing were the stories he had to tell of his early practice at the bar, and of the manners of the Southwest; of the brawls of the inhabitants, and of the lively custom of shooting at sight; of enormous fees and precarious payment! I need not tell you who knew him, that Leonard was not only a born orator, but also a born raconteur. I find, from his own letter to our Secretary, that in January, 1871, he was appointed District Attorney of the Thirteenth Judicial District of Louisiana.*

He must have gone into politics not long after his arrival, for (in spite of an evident confusion of dates in his report) I gather that in October, 1871, he was appointed on the staff of Gov. Warmoth, with the rank of Colonel, and in April, 1872, was made a General of Louisiana militia.†

In 1876, Leonard was appointed by Kellogg an Associate Judge of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, "on the recommendation of numerous members of the bar of his district, independent of party." ‡

* Vide letter to the Class Secretary, March 4, 1873.

† These last two dates I have made one year earlier than they are given in his letter to our Secretary; but as that was dated March 4, 1873, the dates therein given are clearly impossible. In this letter he says: "My practice has been large, and during the last two years has been lucrative."

On June 20, 1876, he was nominated as a candidate for Congress. He made a personal canvass of his district and was returned at the election in November, being the only Republican member from Louisiana whose seat was uncontested; the only one, I believe, who retained his seat.*

In considering the political life of our classmate, I think that the testimony in his favor of his political opponents is of peculiar value. Mr. E. John Ellis represents the second district of Louisiana in the Forty-fifth Congress, and is a Democrat. In his letter to our Class Secretary he says, —

"You were right in your surmises as to my warm friendship for Judge Leonard.

"Politically we entertained different views. But I knew he was upright, honest, manly, pure. I could easily comprehend how, from the circumstances of birth, education, and surroundings, he could honestly differ from me, and I believe that his great heart could easily account from similar reasons for my views, and could respect me because he knew that at least they were honestly entertained.

"A strong personal friendship grew up between us, which was only broken by his untimely death."

On the 18th of April eulogies on Leonard were spoken in the House of Representatives at Washington. Mr Ellis was chosen to deliver the main eulogy for the State of Louisiana. In it he says of our classmate, —

"He came there no political tramp, no adventurer seeking to profit from the spoils of a wronged and outraged people. He bought real estate, and, thus identifying himself completely and perfectly with our Commonwealth, he began the practice of law, and coupled with his professional duties the labors of the planter. In both he was successful. Coming at a time when, as I said, the deeds of those bad men had brought the name of the Republican party very low in that State, he, professing to be a Republican, was looked upon at first with suspicion and coldness. But not long was such the case. The people of that State saw that he was honest. They not only saw the polished exterior of the gentleman, but they soon learned that he was indeed a gentleman. Friends gathered about him; and clients, regardless of politics, intrusted him with their business interests. He was elected Commonwealth's attorney, and for the term of four years he performed the duties of that high station with signal dignity and ability. He was appointed to fill a vacancy upon the Supreme Bench of the State, and though his term of service was very brief, yet his opinions

* Leonard "was elected to the Forty-fifth Congress as a Republican, receiving 13,881 votes against 9,212 votes for W. W. Farmer, Democrat, according to the certificate of Gov. Kellogg, and 14,423 votes against 13,016 for W. W. Farmer, according to the certificate of Gov. Nichols."—Congressional Directory.

in cases won for him the respect and confidence of the bench and bar."*

Mr. Cutler, of New Jersey, one of several Democratic members who spoke on the same occasion, said: —

"The unfortunate complications resulting from the political situation of the State of Louisiana made it incumbent upon the deceased, who held the only seat in this House as a Republican from that State unquestioned and unchallenged, that he should take an active part at an early day in the discussion involving the right of a Representative from that State to retain his seat.

"At the outset of the discussion I was impressed with the honesty of his statements, together with the strong conviction of right that characterized the advocacy of the propositions he maintained. His every action appeared to be governed by a keen sense of justice; his impulse to do that which was justified by conscience, make no allegation but what was warranted by the evidence, and draw no deduction or conclusion but what could be defended by the facts and the law.

"I recall with much pleasure, in the discussion of the California case, Wigginton and Pacheco, a remark that he made to me just prior to his argument. 'You are one that believes that election cases are not political, but strictly judicial, and in that view you are not supported by the majority of either of the parties; but I confess to great sympathy with the views that you entertain, and in this case I am compelled to disagree with my party, and I hold the opinion that neither Wigginton or Pacheco is entitled to a seat, and I trust you will listen to my remarks, for I think you will arrive at the same conclusion.'

"I gave close attention to that speech of my friend; and while I could not agree with his conclusions, I could not but admire his independence, when he said during the course of that debate, —

"'As I understand the Constitution of my country, the House of Representatives is now sitting as a court of justice, and each member of this house is a judge, acting under the sanction of his official oath. And am I to be told that it is my duty in such a case to cast my vote as a judge with my party, because, forsooth, the vote which I shall thus cast will be advantageous to me and to others of the same political proclivities? Sir, if so foul a doctrine as that is to be applied in a court of justice, let the meanness of the deed at least be acknowledged and understood. There is no necessity of adding hypocrisy to villany. If the judges of this court are to vote according to their party proclivities, let us have an end of all this farce of a trial and judgment.'"†

The only speeches made by Leonard during the short time he sat in Congress were, I believe, in cases of contested elections; and it is with pride that every member of our class will hear this quotation from them, and this testimony to the impression made by them on a political opponent.

On the 2d of July, 1872, Leonard married Miss Ella Burbank, of St. Paul, Minn. She died on the 29th of December, 1875, leaving two sons, Crosby, born June 4, 1873, and Edward Fox, born January 1, 1875.*

Leonard himself died on the 15th of March, 1878, at Havana. The mystery that hangs over his last journey to Cuba will probably never be cleared away. The evidence that his death was caused by yellow fever is, to my mind, almost conclusive, and I believe that the fever was brought on by fatigue and excitement.

Two books by our classmate have been printed. The last in date is a Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in Louisiana cases, with an appendix containing a short treatise on the jurisdiction and practice of the Federal Courts, compiled in 1875. The other, which will carry us back to our college days, is a collection of early poems, printed in New Orleans in 1871. Several of these were written while he was still among us. They are the graceful verses of one whose genius was not that of a poet, the pleasing and finished productions of a young man of taste and education. Leonard would probably to-day have been the first to smile at them. Yet they are far enough removed from mediocrity to make them pleasant reading, and I cannot resist the temptation to repeat two of them here. The first of these, which I do not remember having seen except in this volume, is very graceful: —

"I fastened a rose with its friendly thorn
In the lace that covered her snowy breast;
The rose was as fair as the blush of the morn,
And its odor was sweet as the breath of the west.

"O, a rose is sweet and a rose is fair,
And only a maiden is fairer still!
And the rose it lay on her bosom there,
And it listened and learned her bosom's will.

"Then redder still did the red rose blush,
And sweeter still did its incense burn,
And it bade my trembling pulses hush,
And whispered that I might listen and learn."

The other poem some of you will probably remember. It was published in the second number of the ill-starred "Collegian": —

"They tell me when the solemn hour
Was nigh, when coursed the blood with feeble pace
Beneath the fell Destroyer's power,
A smile came o'er thy face;

* Letter to the Class Secretary, May 17, 1876.

"And when the chilly hand of death
Was on thy brow, and life's last feeble rill
Was frozen with his icy breath,
That sweet smile lingered still.

"As when the sunlight quits the earth
And leaves its traces on the faded day,
So, when thy bright soul gained its birth,
It kissed thy mortal clay."

Classmates! in the next triennial, the name of one of us will be printed in capitals, and against that name there will be a star. Of our little band, the most brilliant, perhaps, is gone. The chain that unites us all is the chain of memory, and its strongest links are those which attach the dead to the living.

* LANDON RIVES LONGWORTH.

Born in Cincinnati, O., December 25, 1846. Died in Cincinnati, January 14, 1879.

The following extract is from an article in the "Cincinnati Gazette" of January 15, 1879: —

"His choice of a profession had probably not yet been made at the time of his graduation from college, as the next two years of his life were spent in the study of painting under the direction of Hans Gude, in Carlsruhe, Germany. On his return to this country he attended the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons (the medical department of Columbia College), finished the course and received his diploma. In 1873, accompanied by his friend, Dr. Fred. Forchheimer, of this city, he went to Germany and pursued his medical studies at the Allgemeine Krankenhaus, in Vienna, and the Histological Laboratory, in Strasburg. One year was spent thus abroad, but already, in Strasburg, he made a histological discovery of sufficient importance to attract the attention of the German physicians to himself. This was the beginning of a series of labors, which, had he lived to bring them to a ripe fruition, would have placed him, beyond all peradventure, in the front rank of the scientific men of the age. Early in 1875 he was elected Demonstrator, and soon after Professor of Anatomy, of the Medical College of Ohio. This position he filled in a manner that attracted great attention to the institution up to the day of his death. He was also Pathologist to the Cincinnati Hospital, Professor of Skin Diseases at the Good Samaritan Hospital, and had in preparation a series of lectures on acoustics, etc., intended to be delivered before the College of Music. During one year (1876-77) he was editor in chief of The Clinic, and during his whole connection with the Medical College of Ohio he was an occasional contributor to its columns. He did not write much; he was profuse in none of his utterances, but the few words he wrote were vigorous and weighty. A week ago last Monday he was taken sick with a cold; pneumonia resulted, and his constitution, never robust, proved too weak to stand the strain. For the unprepared condition in which the disease found him his working habits were largely to blame. An idea of the immense amount of work which regularly devolved on him can be formed from the enumeration of the responsible positions which he filled. But the time and labor employed in the lecture-room of the college and the clinical rooms of the hospitals represented only the minimum of his application. Of late he had devoted a great deal of attention to a process of his own for injecting the finer tissues of his subjects, and in it he made use of materials the constant inhaling of whose fumes greatly weakened his lungs. This and an excess of work unfitted his constitution for battle with disease. He died, and will be buried to-day beside the grave of his mother, in the grounds surrounding the homestead on East Walnut Hills."

Dr. Forchheimer, alluded to in the above article, read a Memorial Address at the Commencement exercises of the Medical College of Ohio, February 28, 1879, from which I make the following extracts: —

He took the faculty prize for a thesis on "The Ligature of the External Carotid," a thesis remarkable not only for its ripeness, but also for its originality. Of this thesis, his teacher stated in the lecture-room, that it set forth not only the feasibility of the ligature of the external carotid, but also laid down the positive indications regarding cases in which the operation ought to be preferred to the ligature of the common carotid. This thesis was afterwards published in the "Archives of Scientific and Practical Medicine," May, 1873, and received favorable comment, not only at home but also abroad.

While at Strasburg, he published his discoveries of the nerve terminations in the conjunctiva. This article appears in the "Archiv f. Mikroscopische Anatomie of Max Schultze," and can be considered as the beginning of his career as a microscopist.

While Pathologist to the Cincinnati Hospital, Dr. Longworth began his work on photography, injection, and the electric light, in all three branches accomplishing progress in a marked degree. The process of photography of microscopic preparations he developed, by means of a new apparatus, to such an extent that all his results were very satisfactory, — results that would have been given to the world in a short time, if he had lived, in the form of a work on microscopic anatomy, for which some negatives had already been prepared. The methods which he used were described fully in a lecture given by him before the Cincinnati Academy of Medicine, May 18, 1878, entitled "Hints on Improvements in Micro-Photography."

During the last year his whole time was taken up by injecting and the electric light. He devised a new instrument for injecting, his injection mass being of his own invention as well; but the latter is still wanting in a few minutiæ to make it perfect. In the last session of the College, he used the electric candle for his demonstrations in anatomy, and had just completed the construction of a lantern by means of which he could throw the images of solid bodies upon the screen, thus enabling him to perform dissections of organs, such as the brain, before a class of three hundred and fifty, showing each and all of them every step, by means of the large picture thrown upon the screen.

In his studies on electricity, he even went so far as to construct a new electric candle, for which he was granted a patent on the twenty-first of May, 1878

The following obituary sketch has been prepared for this report by Storer, at the request of the Secretary : —

In the death of Landon Rives Longworth last winter, those of us who live in Cincinnati met with a loss which necessarily struck us more keenly, and a sorrow much more personal, than the rest of our class. When we were graduated, twelve years ago, there were but five of us from this city, and of these five one was Longworth's kinsman, and the rest of us had been to the same school and in the same class. Last year, at this time, the class remembered the death of Rufus King, and since then a tie to us here yet kindlier and more intimate has been broken. There are but three left now.

We well remember when Landon first came to the the old "Brooks School," a slight boy, small even for his fourteen years, with great, dark, thoughtful eyes. Boyish rumor of his abilities and precocity had preceded him, and fame had it, and truly, that even then he could play chess blindfolded, more than one game at a time. The average schoolboy was amazed, and at first inclined to mock at the odd pronunciation of Latin and Greek, and the absence of the worldly knowledge that boys prize in one who had been educated, up to this time, only at home. We were awed by his knowlege of, to us, occult things and strange books and places, and the mere fact of his having been a long time in Europe. But we were comforted, and in a certain way felt complimented, by his ignorance of routine school learning, of Latin quantities, and each and every game or play that to the school at large were of so much more importance than books. We soon learned that to these characteristics he added a charm of manner and, even in those days, a certain dignity and individuality of bearing and thought, which endeared him to all who knew him well, and imposed a feeling of respect on those with whom he did not choose to become intimate.

Born December 25, 1846, he was very young when he entered college. What he was and what he did there all the class knew, and perhaps remember as well as we do. But the certainty that we had, and the confidence with which we asserted, that Longworth's was the brightest and most original mind in the class, and would do the best work as soon as he should find out the direction in which he could satisfy himself in his work, we look back to now with pleasure and satisfaction. We knew him, admired him, had faith in him, and all we hoped and promised for him has been justified.

It is not our purpose to discuss or even enumerate the work he did, the talents he multiplied, or the honors he won. These are already recited in the class records, and through the warm appreciation of his professional brethren have become, we may say, a part of the history of practical science and progress of the medical profession in the country, and not our city alone. But it seemed fit that we who, from boyhood, have lived in the same city with Landon Longworth, and who, of late years, alone of our class, had frequent opportunities of meeting him, should try in a few words to say why it was we admired and loved him so much.

He had talents very seldom seen together in one person, and which, from their diversity and excellence, were more than admirable. He had an intense love of music, and that of the highest and most intellectual order. He had the true artist's eye, with a taste and some sense of differences given by nature, and nourished by study and culture, that both in form and color were almost unerring. He brought these same qualities into his judgment of the thought and imagination of others, and his criticism of a man, of a book, of a theory, of an argument, was always thoughtful, full of acumen, and never superficial.

His mind was wise and catholic; he despised nothing simply because it was popular. His reason was never provincial; by nature and by experience he was, in the best sense of the word, cosmopolitan.

On more than one instrument of music he was no mean proficient, while his knowledge of the theory of the art was profound for an amateur. He dropped the active practice of painting when he began his medical studies, and seldom after touched a brush; yet every bit of canvass which bears his work bears too the clear and certain proof, not only of ability to execute, unsurpassed by many of our professional painters, but of a power and grasp of imagination equalled by few.

His researches and discoveries in the scientific pursuits of his chosen profession proved his possession, to an eminent degree, of those faculties which are generally found deficient in minds in which the æsthetical element is delicately and highly developed. Members of his own profession, looking with admiration at his abilities, in which imagination and enthusiasm were thoroughly blended with the coldest reason and the most rigid logical accuracy, and at his marvellous industry and genius for hard mental work, could not envy him his peculiar advantages of relief from the necessity for bread-winning, and his leisure and opportunity for costly scientific work. They knew that fortune had put these opportunities into fit hands.

His intellect was many-sided; his reading and general culture wide and thoroughly at hand. From a boy his memory was singularly tenacious, and when he became interested, his talk on wellnigh any subject was rich with analogy and illustration.

While not the least tempered, he was the sweetest tempered and most tolerant young man we knew. At anything foolish, unmanly, or Philistine said or repeated, he would sometimes break out into sarcasm or indignation, but always, it seemed, with charity and, as it were, pardon for the offender. His mind was so busy, and his power of self-abstraction so great, that his manner would appear at times distant and even repelling; but so soon as his attention was gained, his innate charm and courtesy, unstudied and unaffected, were joined to a quickness of apprehension and reply, to a sense of humor, poetry, true heroism, as made talk with him rich, inspiriting, and full.

The most natural and unaffected of men, in spite of some marked individualities and unconventionalities, he had a remarkable insight into the feelings of other people, great mimetic power, and sense of dramatic effect. These made him not only a delightful talker, but gave him great popularity and success as a lecturer and instructor in the medical college to which his loss was so irreparable a blow. Like all who came in contact with him in any way that appealed to his deep sympathies and power of help, the students were much attached to him. Their pride in him as their professor, their admiration for his wonderful acquirements, and desire to lose none of his lectures and experiments, we are told, seemed like a fascination.

Extremely reserved concerning his merely private and personal feelings and doings, he avoided any mention of them, and even any talk which might seem in any way soft or sentimental; but his benefactions and personal sacrifices of time and comfort toward the poor and those whom he found needing help, advice, or kindly sympathy, studiously kept secret by him, have since come to light to gladden the hearts of his friends.

This is what we thought Landon Longworth was, and this was why we admired and loved him.

* FRANK BENTON MILDRAM.

Born in Wells, Me., July 15, 1842. Died in Wells, Me., September 19, 1875.

At the meeting of the Class on Commencement Day, 1876, the following sketch of his life and character, prepared by Tripp, was read: —

The death of Frank Benton Mildram, at his native place, Wells, Me., in September, 1875, which was announced to the class by the Secretary's circular letter of April 12, 1876, is an event which calls for more than a passing notice.

After completing his professional studies in Boston, feeling convinced that the climate of the Eastern States was inimical to his constitutional weakness, he resolved to go to San Francisco and begin work. He went there in 1870, an entire stranger. He left his practice there and came home to die, in 1874, but during these four years he had achieved a success of which his classmates may justly be proud, for it was without parallel in their various experience. He told me that during the last year of his practice in San Francisco, he tried a hundred cases in court, besides disposing of a large amount of other business. This was not the result of accident, but of certain characteristics, clearly perceived by those who knew him well in his earlier years. There was plenty of generous ambition and unflinching energy, and mingled with these a cheery, hearty manner and a winning tact, that made you his friend even while he was defeating you. An incident will illustrate this disposition. When he was barely twenty-one he had been proposed as a candidate for the State Legislature from Wells, and came within four votes of the election. "I am going to the Legislature from Wells before I go to California; nobody shall say I went away a defeated man," he used frequently to say, and in the fall of 1868 he did run again and was successful. I wondered how he could accomplish it, for he had been absent from home four or five years, most of the time, and people must have forgotten him to a degree. "Well," said he, "we worked for it. My brothers and friends rallied, of course, and I went to the polls myself. I knew all the doubtful men, and I took them one at a time. 'Last time,' I said, 'I lost the election by four votes; to-day it may be even closer; there may be only one vote required to turn the scale, and yours may be the one.'"

One of the first cases he tried was a defence on some criminal matter in the United States Court. "I was bound to get the man off," he said, "and frequently forgot myself in the heat of the trial. In the afternoon I took a hundred dollars into court, expecting the justice would fine me for contempt." The judge afterwards told him that it was only his evident inexperience and great zeal for his client that saved him from being fined.

But there was something more in this determination to win than mere ambition. Those who knew his circumstances recognized in it a rare loyalty to friends who had sacrificed much that he might possess himself of their opportunities. He had promised that when the time for trial came he would not be wanting, and he was not. In his private life he was without fault; in his business he was without a peer; and though we lament his loss from our number, we are thankful for his bright example.

Voted, That, as a tribute of respect to our deceased classmate, this memorial be entered on the Class Records, and a copy be sent to his widow.

GEORGE HENRY MILLER. Born 1845.

Lawyer in Boston.

Address: 13 Exchange Street, Boston.

HENRY GRAFTON MONKS. Born 1846.

Returned from Europe in September, 1878, and went immediately to California.

Address: San Gabriel, Los Angeles County, Cal.

WILLIAM MONTGOMERY. Born 1844.

Address: 8 and 10 Wall Street, New York.

WILLIAM JAMES MORTON. Born 1845.

Physician in New York.

Was graduated from the Harvard Medical School in July, 1872, after serving an extra year as House Surgeon in the Massachusetts General Hospital.

Practised in Boston and Mt. Desert.

In October, 1873, went to Europe for study in his profession. In the spring of 1874, he went to Capetown, South Africa, and from thence into the interior to Kimberley, the capital of the colony of Griqualand West, and second only in importance among the towns of South Africa to Capetown itself.

The population of Kimberley was about 20,000, about evenly divided between whites and blacks, collected about the site of the great diamond mine as diggers, buyers and sellers of diamonds, shopkeepers, and followers of the various pursuits common to any large town. Churches, clubs, theatres, and hotels had sprung up, good houses were built, and it was altogether a vigorous community, orderly, industrious, and cultivated, composed of the best of the colonists, both English and Dutch, and of families of good circumstances from England; in all respects entirely unlike an American mining camp or town, accounted for probably by the very considerable capital required to make a beginning of diamond seeking.

In this community, two years were spent in arduous but agreeable and profitable practice of his profession. This, in a very few months, grew to be larger than he could attend to, and he later sent to an American physician in England, to come out and assist him, as well as eventually to take his practice when he left.

He also owned claims in the mine and had them worked by gangs of natives under white overseers, as is the custom in diamond mining.

He made several long journeys further into the interior, seeing much that was remarkable and interesting among the natives, and having many exciting hunting excursions in the "Hunter's Paradise."

In 1876 he returned to Europe and spent much time in travel in England, France, and Germany, returning towards the end of the year to America. Soon after his return he was elected a member of the American Geographical Society, and read a paper before it entitled "South African Diamond Fields and the Journey to the Mine."

In the summer of 1877 he again visited Europe, this time sent out as medical expert to decide upon the case of a patient then in a German insane asylum, returning with his patient in the fall. He then, in spite of the many advantages the diamond fields still offered for practice, concluded to settle in New York.

He contributed two illustrated articles to "Scribner's Magazine," entitled "To South Africa for Diamonds."

Is a contributor also of various articles upon medical subjects.

He is a member of the County Medical Society of New York; of the Medico-Legal Society, and member and Secretary of the New York Neurological Society. Is also assistant to the chair of Diseases of the Mind and Nervous System in the University of New York, and assistant editor to a new medical journal, issued in April, entitled "Neurological Contributions," of which Prof. William A. Hammond is editor.

* EDWARD REYNOLDS SPAULDING.

Born in Brattleboro, Vt., August 10, 1844. Died in Dorchester, Mass., April 16, 1876.

At the meeting of the Class on Commencement Day, 1876, the following sketch of his life and character, prepared by E. S. Wood, was read: —

With the career of our beloved classmate, EDWARD REYNOLDS SPAULDING, during the four years which he spent with us, the many difficulties which he encountered and the manner in which he overcame them, we are all familiar. After his graduation, during a portion of the first year he was engaged in business, striving to gain means to enable him to pursue the study of the profession upon which he had set his heart, and for which he was so admirably fitted.

In September, 1868, he entered the Harvard Medical School, but the same difficulties which beset him during his college course still pursued him while engaged in the study of medicine, and were successfully overcome in the same manner as in college by his perseverance, industry, and ability. His second year of medical study he spent at the Hartford "Retreat for the Insane," under the direction of Dr. J. S. Butler, and it was at this time that he began to direct his attention to the special branch of medicine which he followed in after years. After receiving his degree of Doctor of Medicine in March, 1871, he practised his profession as Second Assistant Physician at the Northampton (Mass.) Lunatic Hospital for about a year and a half, when he resigned on account of feeble health, the overwork and confinement necessarily attendant upon his hospital life having sown the seeds of the disease which afterwards proved fatal. After about six months of general practice in Newport, R. I., his health was so much improved that he accepted a reappointment to his former position, but was compelled in about a year again to resign, his second term of service at the hospital proving a powerful ally to the disease which already had a slight hold upon his lungs. From this time (June, 1874) his health gradually failed, in spite of desperate attempts to resist the inroads which the disease was slowly but surely making, two voyages to the Azores proving unavailing, until finally, on April 16, 1876, he died at the residence of his brother, Rev. Henry G. Spaulding, in Dorchester, Mass.

It is a sad duty, indeed, which we have to perform, to record the death of one so noble, one who endeared himself to all by his generosity of heart, and the strength and purity of his character, one so much beloved by those to whose sufferings it was his duty to administer, whose strict conscientiousness, honesty, and marked ability won for him the respect of every one, and one who, had his life been spared, would have been an honor to his profession.

To his family, relatives, and friends we tender our deepest sympathy in their great bereavement, expressing our grief at the loss of so true a friend and so honored a classmate.

Voted, That as a tribute of respect to our deceased classmate, this memorial be entered on the Class Records, and a copy be sent to his family.

CLASS FUND.

At the meeting of the Class, held on Commencement Day, June 28, 1876, that part of the Secretary's Report, No. 5, for 1876, which referred to the Class Fund was discussed, and various plans for the relief of the Class were suggested. It was unanimously

"Voted, That the Secretary open a subscription to restore the Class Fund to $3,000; that he notify each member of the Class of this vote, and that the amounts subscribed be payable at once, or by instalments, on or before Commencement, 1879."

In accordance with that vote that subscription was announced open by a circular letter sent to each member of the Class.

The subscriptions received since that call have amounted to $210.

The continued depression in business of all kinds and the necessity for economy so generally felt have persuaded the Secretary that it was inexpedient to urge this matter until the return of prosperous days.

I have prepared a statement of our financial condition on June 1, 1879, which covers the entire period since graduation.
